It's scary to think that someone you know could become involved in violent extremism, but the contributing social factors are surprisingly common: withdrawal, isolation and loneliness.

When these feelings combine with intense political, ideological or religious interest, the risk of involvement becomes even greater.

You can help.

By showing that you care, and listening without judgement, you may be able to help someone to meet their needs in a safer way.

Step Together can help.

Step Together is a helpline and online support service that aims to 'help the helpers' - people who know someone that may be headed down the path to violent extremism.
